- Corneal sensitivity to touch is assessed by an aesthesiometer that measures the corneal touch threshold (CTT), which is the reciprocal of corneal sensitivity. Sensitivity varies across the cornea, with the centre being the most sensitive. Diseases and rigid contact lens wear greatly reduce the sensitivity of the cornea.

- To determine corneal sensitivity and evaluate corneal nerves before and after keratoplasty for Fuchs endothelial dystrophy. Methods Central corneal sensitivity, measured by using a Cochet-Bonnet esthesiometer in 69 eyes before and after different keratoplasty procedures for Fuchs dystrophy, was compared to that of 35 age-matched normal corneas.

- Corneal esthesiometry is typically used clinically to evaluate for neurotrophic keratopathy. In research, esthesiometry has been used for various purposes to include recording the duration of an analgesic on the cornea or indicating the corneal health in long-term contact wearers [2] [4] [5].

The corneal sensitivity of the centre of the cornea and at four corneal regions, namely, nasal, inferior, temporal and superior at 2.0 mm from the limbus of the right eye of 596 subjects aged 15 to 81 were measured using a Cochet-Bonnet aesthesiometer. All measurements were performed by the same examiner at 18 degrees centigrade and 35 per cent humidity between 2:00 and 5:00 pm. The subjects
